Please find our fourth edition of the Cyber Capsule. As in months past, we continue to see an emphasis on two trends — an emphasis on cybersecurity funding and an emphasis on information sharing. Information sharing, however, highlights a common tension in the incident response world — determining the right amount of information to share. It is often difficult for a business responding to an incident to know what information to share and when. Mandatory disclosure requirements, of course, take some of that decision-making away from a business. The question becomes: Do these mandatory disclosures do more harm than good? It depends on who you ask.
