Giving companies the option to report quarterly or semiannually is “strange” and could make it harder for asset managers, who want “as much information as possible,” to compare companies across different industries, Jay Dubow, a partner at Troutman Pepper Locke, told FundFire.

“It would make life for asset managers a little harder,” he said. “If I’m an asset manager, quarterly is better because you’re getting more information. If you’re going to have some quarterly and some semiannual, that’s not ideal either because it becomes harder to compare.”
