During the past year, state attorneys general across the nation continued to extend their consumer protection influence, enforcing state and federal laws. Looking ahead to 2022, we see several areas that appear ripe for state AG enforcement.

With increased coordination among state attorneys general through the multistate investigation process, along with new priorities and regulatory trends, we expect that new dynamics will be introduced into the state regulatory landscape.

While the path forward might appear blurry in some areas at present, one thing is clear: The current landscape presents an irresistible opportunity for state AGs looking to position their offices as leaders in regulatory enforcement, both within state borders and nationally.
