Introduction

Regulators are increasingly interested in transactions related to consumer technology. For example, hybrid transactions involving the purchase and sale of Internet of Things (IoT) devices is one area ripe for regulatory oversight and enforcement as detailed in our prior article, “Regulators Likely to Focus on Hybrid Transactions and IoT Devices.” In the regulatory world, the “right to repair” is also quickly gaining momentum. On July 9, President Biden issued an executive order compelling, among many other things, the Federal Trade Commission to draft “right to repair” rules to increase consumers’ ability to repair equipment on their own or at after-market repair shops.

Four Democratic state attorneys general are investigating the online fundraising practices of WinRed, a Republican-affiliated political action committee (PAC), and ActBlue, a Democratic-affiliated PAC. WinRed recently punched back by filing a declaratory judgment action, asserting that federal campaign finance laws preempt the state attorneys general’s investigation. This article outlines WinRed’s response and discusses how this investigation provides another example of state attorneys general expanding their inquiries to national matters already regulated by the federal government.

FTC INVESTIGATIONS

FTC GREEN LIGHTS INVESTIGATIONS OF KEY ENFORCEMENT TARGETS

By Timothy Butler, Carlin McCrory, and Matthew White

On July 1, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) voted to approve seven omnibus resolutions authorizing staff attorneys to use compulsory process to investigate key enforcement targets. The vote fell along party lines, with Democratic Commissioners Lina Khan, Rohit Chopra, and Kelly Slaughter voting in favor of the resolutions, while Republican Commissioners Christine Wilson and Noah Phillips voted against them. The vote — along with several others made at the same public hearing — again signals that newly minted Chair Lina Khan intends to remake the FTC into a much more aggressive, and potentially much more partisan, consumer protection agency.

VIRGINIA CORPORATION COMMISSION

VIRGINIA STATE CORPORATION COMMISSION AMENDS SHORT-TERM LENDER REGULATIONS

By Chris Carlson, Andy Flavin, and Ketan Bhirud

On July 12, the Virginia State Corporation Commission issued an order amending regulations for short-term lending licensees under Va. Code § 6.2-1800, et seq. (Chapter 18). This licensing regime stems from the Virginia General Assembly's passage of the Fairness in Lending Act that took effect on January 1.
