FEDERAL ENVIRONMENTAL REGULATIONS

BUSINESSES GRAPPLING WITH FEDERAL REGULATION MAY LOOK TO STATES AS ALLIES

By David Ross, Misha Tseytlin, and Houston Shaner

As the Biden administration settles in, the pendulum of federal power has begun to swing back toward greater regulation. In response, regulated entities are beginning to review their range of options to engage in, challenge, or prepare for the host of new regulatory and enforcement initiatives that will shape their business practices for the next several years. While ramping up advocacy efforts, strategic planning, and internal compliance procedures, members of the regulated community interested in challenging federal regulatory activity may have an important potential ally: state attorneys general (AGs). State AGs, along with state governors and legislatures, will play key roles in shaping how far and in what domains new regulations will reach. State AGs frequently lead the charge in challenging or defending federal action in court; they help guide regulatory implementation, and they can have significant influence over enforcement. The private sector is therefore not alone in bearing the risk of new federal initiatives, as states often stand to cede their traditional regulatory authority and control over their budgets.

By Stephen Piepgrass, Chris Carlson, and Rachel Miklaszewski

Originally Published in Law360

Now as the Biden administration takes office, and with the shoe on the other foot, a coalition of six Republican state attorneys general come committed to use "all available means to combat potential federal overreach." If the partisan divide remains in Congress, as foreshadowed by the current COVID-relief legislation, President Biden's supporters will urge him to follow the lead of Presidents Obama and Trump and pass landmark policies through executive orders and federal agency regulations. If President Biden takes this road more traveled, we expect even more of the 26 Republican attorneys general to coalesce and file actions to halt such policies.
