Troutman Pepper Locke welcomes the members of the Young Professionals in Energy to a networking reception followed by a panel discussion in our New York office. We hope you will join us!

Community solar projects offer significant benefits to both developers and consumers (individuals, businesses, and other groups) by providing broader access to solar energy, typically through a subscription model. The Inflation Reduction Act has introduced various incentives aimed at encouraging the development of community solar projects. Renewable energy counsel and developers must understand the legal and regulatory landscape.

The panel will provide comprehensive guidance for renewable energy professionals on the development of community solar projects. The discussion will focus on the supply chain in such projects, including associated legal and regulatory benefits and challenges, tax incentives, renewable energy certificates (RECs), and other critical considerations essential for the successful development of community solar projects.
